Guernsey Hall

Founders: 1876; Chartered 1889
From greenhouses to professional offices
Renovation architect: William Sturk

The Ames-Webster House

 Erected: 1874
From private residence to professional offices
Renovation architect: Child, Rubenach, Tourtellot

The University Plaza

The Old Cotton Exchange

Located: Tex., 1884
From cotton exchange to club, offices
Renovation architect: Graham, B. Eakin

Designed by architect Ezzell, house is one of the most significant examples of Victorian business architecture. It was the largest cotton exchange in the world and housed the central office of the Texas Cotton Exchange. In 1971, the building was acquired by the state and converted into an office complex. The building features a grand staircase, ornate ceilings, and a spectacular glass skylight.

The Ames-Webster House

In 1974, the house was acquired by the state and converted into an office complex. The building features a grand staircase, ornate ceilings, and a spectacular glass skylight.

The University Plaza

The Old Cotton Exchange

Designed by architect Ezzell, the building is one of the most significant examples of Victorian business architecture. It was the largest cotton exchange in the world and housed the central office of the Texas Cotton Exchange. In 1971, the building was acquired by the state and converted into an office complex. The building features a grand staircase, ornate ceilings, and a spectacular glass skylight.

In 1971, the building was acquired by the state and converted into an office complex. The building features a grand staircase, ornate ceilings, and a spectacular glass skylight.

In 1971, the building was acquired by the state and converted into an office complex. The building features a grand staircase, ornate ceilings, and a spectacular glass skylight.